BIOLOGY

- How does DNA work?
- Can I explain evolution?
- How do organisms respond to change?
- How is energy transferred between organisms?

By studying Biology you will be able to answer all these questions and more!

"Biology is the study of complicated things that have the appearance of having been designed with a purpose"

Credit: Pixabay/CC0 Public domain in 2015, long before the first iteration of R/Place, a celebration of collaborative chaos of online spaces, Reddit performed another curious experiment called R/Buttton. The now inactive page once hosted a large red button at the top of your feed along with a 60-second regressive account timer. Each individual user can only press the button once, an action that would then re-establish the countdown. After just over two months, the countdown reached zero for the first time, when no users pressed the button before the 60 seconds were up. As a result, R/TheButton was archived and closed for additional activity, without any apparent purpose. Both R/Place and R/TheButton testified to an Indian tribalism among their users who seemed to manifest themselves outside the online space. If a user pressed the button for a specific interval of ten seconds, a "style" of color was assigned to them next to their user name, feeding a hierarchy of factions within the community. While loyalty forms these factions, a sense of community and belonging sustains them. This kind of faction war is something endemic of the online spaces that invite interactivity. The invitation to interact is also an invitation to corrupt. But this corruption is not always a negative tribalism. Eluding the goals of game developers can also be a powerful act of community building and collaboration. By creating new conversations in the games, interactivity exists on a scale of what will allow the developer of a virtual world. If a developer offers more freedom to its users, it offers more ways for users to interact with each other and with the world in accordance with the objectives and objectives of users. In theVirtual of the first -person shooters video games (think of Call of Duty or Halo), the players know an allied player by bending down and then standing repeatedly, he is trying to greet. A rose -down -down/standing response is the equivalent of hello back. In the absence of any ability to have their online avatar literally wave hello, players have circumvented the limits of the virtual space to do it anyway. (Strangely, if the player is a member of the opposing team this same gesture is offensive and sexually suggestive.) Users have manipulated and circumvented the rules of this world in order to fulfill any number of parallel or even opposing purposes based on their own needs and desires. Shaping our own worlds In a conversation I once had with Adelaide-based narrative designer and game developer Damon Reece, I asked Damon what game they were enjoying lately. They regaled me with an anecdote about Sea of Thieves (2018). In this game, players are expected to play the role of a cutthroat pirate in competition with other marauding bands of pirates. Damon and their friends disregarded this objective and instead invited other players aboard their virtual pirate ship for drinking, dancing and general merriment. In video game terminology, an "open-world game" like Sea of Thieves is a virtual world open to the free-roaming of its players. This freedom means the possibilities of these worlds are dictated by the communities that occupy them as much as it is by the developers that build them. In Grand Theft Auto V (2013), the highest grossing media product of all time, players are meant to focus their efforts on building their own criminal empire. This is the advertised goal of the game and the fictional city of Los Santos is a virtual space designed to facilitate it. However, the online metropolis also plays host to communities of car meets, police role-players, photographers, social clubs, film makers and protesters. Some of these are intended consequences of the game's robust design but most are the result of like-minded individuals collectively shaping their shared online spaces. Across a broad spectrum of virtual worlds users have, time and again, the space to meet your needs. Online spaces, as well as offline spaces, evolve to meet the demands of their users. For good or for evil, they are fundamentally democratic spaces formed by the communities that use them. Where these online spaces differ from their offline counterparts are in their global accessibility and almost total anonymity. It is difficult to imagine a democratic space occupied not by faces or bodies, but by user names and avatars, but this is precisely the form of democracy offered by virtual worlds.
